III. SITE VISIT WITH HUI MAA'AINANA O MAKANA

Office of Hawaiian Affairs Board of Trustees Site Visit – Wednesday, May 13, 2015 – Page 1 of 3
Mr. Wann shared briefly about the history, mission, and work of Hui Maka‘āinana o Makana, including how it is a grassroots based organization comprised of many of the families who lived in the area. At Hāʻena, they practice ‘āina mōmōna.

Mr. Wann told a taro patch story which he believes illustrates what is going on at Hāʻena. A group had to remove a large tree stump, which took over 40 people to remove. They had to pull it out, roll it on the ground, and finally removed it. That simple act of digging out the tree stump was an important life lesson and reminder that if a group of determined people pull together and put their minds to something, anything can be done.

Mr. Carlos Andrade noted that at the time Hāʻena became a state park, the State evicted those that lived in the area. In the decades since that happened, it took a while to bring people back onto the land.

Mr. Keliʻi Alapai shared that at Hāʻena, they try to stay focused because despite the mistakes people will make, it will help move Hawaiian culture forward. Ultimately, they are all doing this because of a desire to leave a better place for the keiki of the future. All of their hard work was realized when they saw hundreds of people turn out to support the Community Based Subsistence Fishing Area rules hearing for Hāʻena’s proposed rules.

Mr. Kawika Winter provided historical information and a tour of the loʻi, Makana, woods, and beach areas.

Mr. Chipper Wichman thanked OHA for its support—monetary and advocacy—and the part it played in helping their effort to restore traditions. During the Great Mahele, the Hāʻena area went to Paki, who never set foot here, who then gave it to Pauahi, who gave it to William Keyes, a land surveyor. In the late 1800s, Hāʻena was purchased and until 1967, people lived a traditional life, trying to get back to a subsistence culture. After the State took the land, overgrowth spread to the loʻi. Over the years, a movement to do an archaeological survey brought people back. As the people have returned, they have wanted to make sure to protect Hāʻena for future generations. The long range vision is to make it a means for culturally appropriate economic opportunity.

Mr. Kevin Chang shared that he loved working at OHA, but wanted to work on self-governance, which led him to leave and work at Kuaʻāina Ulu ʻAuamo (KUA). There, he sees self-governance is truly what is happening at Hāʻena, where they have worked for eight years to the point of having Hawaiian being in support of something. He added that Milolii, Moʻomomi and others are coming up next and they are all watching to see what happens at Hāʻena. He noted that it is hard because they went through the process, but it is still on the Governor’s desk.

Chair Lindsey told Mr. Chang that he will ask OHA Administration to follow-up regarding the status of the CBSFA rules for Hāʻena.
